Q: Why is it bad to use a regex with a variable? I'm rather new to Regex but have seen some code I don't really understand. This is an example from php to make it simpler: $text = "code: $(item.code)"; preg_match("/$\(([a-z0-9A-Z])\)/", $text, $matches); The explanation in php is this: If you use a regular expression with a string, the regular expression will be applied to every character in the string. If the string is an expression, the regular expression is applied to the string as a whole. You must escape the backslash in the string, which you can do by doubling it. I understand the different parts of the preg_match, but why is it bad to use a regex with a variable? Why would this be bad? A: It's called Variable Substitution. It allows you to use things that are stored in variables. It's good practice to escape them so they don't end up in the output. The php manual on Variable Substitution A: The reason it's bad to use a variable that way is that it is very easy to mix things up. You're making a regular expression that needs to be this one (javascript): preg_match('/$\(\w\)/', $string); with $string having the value: $(whatever whatever whatever) Not a good idea. You need to escape that variable's contents with a backslash. Usually in a real problem the author of the code using the variable would not use a variable in that situation, they'd just include whatever they need to in the regular expression, eg. preg_match("/$\(/"(?whatever)\)"/", $string); But that's just a matter of style. Some people like to put a bang at the start of the regular expression like so: preg_match("#^$\(#(?whatever)\)#", $string); A: Variable substitution using regex is horrible to debug. You have to debug regexes in PHP all the time. For example you have pattern that matches all dots, which

The present disclosure relates to a semiconductor structure, and particularly to a fin-FET with a nitride spacer for silicon germanium (SiGe) fins and a method for manufacturing the same. FinFETs and Tri-Gate devices offer superior short-channel effect control due to a three-dimensional channel, better gate control and higher current drive. A FinFET is a transistor built around a thin piece of silicon called the fin. The fin contains the drain, source and body regions of the transistor. The channel is formed in the vertical fin from the drain to the source. A gate is provided over (e.g., wrapping) the fin. The gate allows the channel to be controlled. The Tri-Gate device is another type of three-dimensional transistor in which a gate wraps around three sides of a channel region. A silicon-on-insulator (SOI) wafer is used for manufacturing of Tri-Gate devices. The semiconductor die has a back gate (or buried gate) on the buried oxide. The back gate is electrically connected to a separate metal layer. The buried oxide allows a higher drive current.A rapid method for the isolation of highly enriched Epstein-Barr virus-specific primed, interferon-sensitive, virus-producing cells from PBMC. A rapid and reproducible method was developed for the preparation of highly enriched Epstein-Barr virus (EBV) binding cells (B cells) from peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMC) by fluorescence activated cell sorting (FACS). The source of EBV was a B95-8 strain of EBV-transformed lymphoblastoid cell line (LCL). The method is based on the selection of a cell population by its specific and high affinity attachment to biotinylated EBV particles. No knowledge of the identity of the EBV receptor on B cells is required. The enrichment of EBV binding cells isolated by this method is at least 1000-fold, and the cells can be maintained in liquid culture for at least 7 days, without interference from nonbinding cell populations. Primed and interferon-sensitive EBV producing cells can be easily isolated and maintained. The presence of interferon-gamma modulates the number of EBV-binding cells. On the basis of flow cytometric analyses, it appears that most of the B cells in the unfractionated PBMC population (less than 1% of the total cells) attach to the EB
