The Complicated Lives of Clean Water Activists Spread the love Austin, TX - What started as a small flood control project has now grown into a 25-acre muck-strewn lake and a public fish hatchery among a working farm, homes, and a busy industrial complex. This is the story of the Clinton River Watershed — and it's a story about the contentious ideas that have spawned a community-driven group of environmental activists who fight for clean water, storm water management, and a biologically diverse river system that is integral to their local economy. They are known as the Conservation Rangers. "We've heard that we've got all these policies that we need to change. And that's what we're trying to do. We're trying to save our history and our culture. We're trying to save our wetlands and our forests and our rivers, so that we can have a little bit of our history here and we can have a little bit of our culture here. We can just stay here, you know. Because we live here," said Sarah Thompson, one of the Conservation Rangers. From the beginning, the Conservation Rangers believe it's not enough to protect some of the natural resources that shape their community. They insist their community needs to be preserved so that its residents can continue to live there. The group's vision is to create a livable community. The Clinton River runs in a loop outside of Austin. Source: Author They started with modest goals. "Our first project was to clean up a little drainage ditch that nobody would do," said Thompson. "And from the beginning, we've always been a really small community; we've always had kind of a strong relationship, we've always been kind of neighborhood-oriented. And so the first project we did was a little drainage ditch that nobody cared about. We picked it up, we cleaned it, we planted a couple of native trees in it, and we called it the Clinton River Park." That was in 2001. Over the course of the next 20 years, the Conservation Rangers have continued to refine their goals and mission. "We all believe in protecting the environment. But when we started talking about it, we realized that we had very, very different ideas
