“The great challenge for the FIFA team was to create an intensity and sense of speed that people have not seen in a football game yet,” said Adam Bhatti, Creative Director at EA SPORTS. “HyperMotion provides the foundation on which we’ll build the intensity and realism of our gameplay.” Here are some things you need to know: About HyperMotion In FIFA 22, we have used player motion captured in Motion-Capture suits which present players with very unique challenges. Not only are there a number of constraints to how a player can pose, but also the player has to really commit, execute high intensity movements. To get them to deliver these movements at a quality level we had to come up with a new concept that we call HyperMotion. This features a set of technologies and game mechanics that are designed to optimise the pacing and intensity of gameplay, as well as the player’s movements. With a full motion capture session being around 4 hours long, we needed to be able to compress that into the experience of the player, so that they are able to feel like they’re fully immersed in the action. We’ve created several different environments, including the pitch, midfield, wide and corners. Each environment is designed with the specific movement requirements in mind, and with this information, we were able to optimise the player movement and overall impact that he will have in each part of the game. Motion Capture While we had some prior experience using motion capture, this was the first project where we looked at doing it in full-scale field-based motion capture. For this we partnered with a motion capture institution called Merlin that does a full suite of motion capture studios across the globe. This used a number of professional football players, who were recorded with helmet mounted cameras, static markers and double-support markers. The markers track the movement of the player as they perform passes, dribbles and tackles. Each of these is triggered individually so that they can be tracked by a motion capture camera. Each player is also recorded with wireless or wired sensors on their shoe and body to track their movement and precision. These sensors show the distance that the player is able to travel, as well as how much force is actually exerted. For example, the distance travelled by a player on a pass, or the force used by a player to make a precision tackle. This data is then sampled and
