Genetic and chemical mutagenesis can significantly alter the characteristics of genetically engineered proteins, such as catalytic efficiency, solubility, stability, and processability. As a result, the design and manufacture of proteins has become a very complex and costly undertaking. Even once a desired protein has been designed and produced, it may not possess the desired characteristics. In order to aid in overcoming some of these problems, methods of protein modification have been developed to generate a protein that possesses a desirable characteristic. For instance, specific amino acids have been substituted with other amino acids having the same property. However, these approaches result in proteins with low expression levels, unstable proteins, and undesirable side effects. Accordingly, there is a need in the art for methods of modifying the amino acid sequence of a protein to enhance the desirable characteristics thereof.

public partial class Book {
    public Book(string title) { this.Title = title; } public Book() { this.Title = ""; } public int Id { get; set; } public string Title { get; set; }

When my controller is posted back to the view, I set the ViewBag.Book object to my Book entity, like this:

public ActionResult Search(SearchCriteria criteria) {
    ViewBag.Book = new Book() {
