

We have implemented a SubBytes block (S-box) with block RAM instead of calculating . Because every 8th bit of a 64-bit key is used for parity . On a 64-bit machine, more bytes of RAM can be used. This means that several processes can run on one physical processor core, and the data exchange speed increases. It also reduces the operating time of the entire system as a whole. That's not all. You can also say that the S-boxes are very convenient to use. They allow you to easily share data and blocks of memory between processes without overloading the system. For most applications, this is very important.
